Litti-chokha, is hands down the best Indian street food. Apart from being deceptively delicious, it's packed with the goodness of gram flour or sattu, and makes the best morning fix that will get you through the day.

And now this gem from Bihar, is all set to mak its mark a the Manila international food festival to be held from May 31.

According to a Hindustan Times report, Litti expert Dinesh Kumar, along with a tikki-chaat maker from Delhi, Dalchand and Rekha Devi, will be representing India under the banner of National Association of Streetfood Vendors of India (NASVI).

The five-day event hosted by World Streetfood Congress in Manila, will have 17 countries participating in it. There will be 30 stalls each, out of which India will have two, states the report.

“The best varieties on show will be given a certificate of excellence. If Bihari food gets rated the best, it will not only make the country proud, but street food vendors of the state too will feel encouraged,” said Dinesh Kumar to HT.

Dinesh Kumar, who hails from Darbhanga district, started selling 'bhelpuri' near the Patna Museum in the early 2000s. His tryst with 'littis' began in 2003 when he set up a stall at Dak Bungalow road and his business went skyrocketing, to the extent that NASVI invited him to take part in the Manila grub fest.
